We may rail at Blue Laws and Puritan strictness as much as we please, but certainly those communities where our fathers carried out their ideas fully had their strong points; and rude and primitive as our meeting-houses were, this weekly union of all classes in them was a most powerful and effi-cient means of civilization. The man or woman cannot utterly sink whi on every seventh day is obliged to appear in decent apparel, and to join with all the standing and respectability of the community in a united act of worship. -Harriet Beecher Stowe in Old Town

If the question had been asked during the third quarter of the 19th century, "Who is the typical American of this period?" a perspicacious observer, might have replied, "Phinehas T. Bar-num." Barnum not only assumed that the people liked to be fooled-that was an ancient discovery-but he also discovered the immense potentiality of advertising. And he demonstrated in his Great Moral Show that it made little difference what the object was-wooly horse, anaconda, or the elephant Jumbo-so long as it was effectively advertised. Imitating him, later promoters have made almost anything
